

Prairie Folks

An excerpt: Uncle Ethan had a theory that a man's character could be told by the way he sat in a wagon seat. A mean man sets right plumb in the middle o the seat, as much as to say, Walk, gol darn yeh, who cares? But a man that sets in one corner o the seat, much as to say, Jump in--cheaper t ride n to walk, you can jest tie to. Uncle Ripley was prejudiced in favor of the stranger, therefore, before he came opposite the potato patch, where the old man was bugging his vines. The stranger drove a jaded-looking pair of calico ponies, hitched to a clattering democrat wagon, and he sat on the extreme end of the seat, with the lines in his right hand, while his left rested on his thigh, with his little finger gracefully crooked and his elbows akimbo. He wore a blue shirt, with gay-colored armlets just above the elbows, and his vest hung unbuttoned down his lank ribs. It was plain he was well pleased with himself.
