

The Princess PourQuoi: Illustrated

Once upon a time, in a country very far away, a new princess was born. As is usual in such cases, the King, her father, and the Queen, her mother, held a great christening feast, to which were invited all the crowned heads for miles around, all the nobility of their own kingdom, and the fairies whose good wishes were considered desirable. In the middle of the ceremony, as is also customary, a very angry little old lady, with a nose like a beak, burst into the room. May I ask why I was not invited? she demanded. These are here, and she pointed to the fairy who rules the hearts of men, and to the fairy who rules circumstance. She herself was the fairy who rules mens minds. You! stammered his Majesty. Why, it is only a girl. We - we thought you would be offended. Later, if a son should be born - You thought! shrieked the enraged little creature, gathering her shoulder-shawl about her. You thought nothing whatever about it. I am insulted, and I shall be revenged. Before anything yet has been given to this child I shall curse her - Oh! begged the crowned heads and the nobility. Yes, said the fairy, stamping and growing angrier, I shall curse her with amind. Anything but that, groaned his Majesty. Not that for a woman-child, moaned the mother, from under her silken coverlid. Yes, said the fairy, and her wicked black eyes snapped over her withered red cheeks. She is a woman-child, and yet she shall think. She shall be alien to her own sex, and undesired by the other. She shall ask and it will not be given her. She shall achieve and it shall count her for naught. Men shall point the finger at her like this (and she pointed one skinny forefinger at the King), and shall whisper, There goes the woman with brains, poor thing! As for your Majesty, in her shall you find your punishment. She shall think what you do not know, and divine what you cannot find out. Now, added the wicked fairy, turning to the two godmothers who stood by the child's cradle, see if you, with all your giving, can do anything to lessen the curse that I have spoken, and she rushed away like a whirlwind, leaving every face dismayed.
